Introduction

Ancient Greek scribes generally wrote continuously without separating letters into words. To facilitate reading of ancient texts, editorial characters were added. These characters have been preserved and are also used in modern editions of the texts.

The Two Dot Punctuation was used to indicate the end of a sentence or change of speaker. The lower dot should be placed at the baseline, the upper dot should be placed at the top of the line.

The Four Dot Punctuation and Dotted Cross were used in the margin as highlighter marks to indicate points of interest in the text or the final stanza of a hymn. For the Four Dot Punctuation, the middle dots appear half way up the line. The upper dot appears just above the line and the lower dot just below the line (see examples below).

The property for these characters is “Po”.
